

THE NATHAN MURDER.

The Question of the Open Door—What a News-... The New York Post of Saturday evening says—No trace of the murderer of Mr. Nathan has yet been found, and it seems that a respectable portion of the community have little else to do but to circulate sensational reports of arrests and fresh evidence.

It was reported yesterday afternoon that four persons were under arrest at Police headquarters under suspicion. There was no truth whatever in the story.

This morning an equally absurd report was in circulation. The gossip had it that two prisoners had been taken last night to the Tombs, upon whom were found the watch and diamond studs of the murdered Mr. Nathan. The report originated in the fact that two men, who were brought in last evening by detectives, charged with suspiciously entering a house. They were confined in cells, and subsequently ordered up stairs by Captain Kelso for examination.

Eight hundred dollars reward has been offered for the identification of a man who, on the morning of the murder of Mr. Nathan, was seen to pick up a piece of paper that was lying on the top front doorstep of the house in Twenty-third street. This is a new phase of the case, and involves a curious and important piece of evidence.

The steps leading up to the front door of Mr. Nathan's house are sheltered from the rain by a portico, or projecting roof, which affords an excellent opportunity for the deposit of anything that may be blown there. One newsboy has long been in the habit of using the steps for this purpose, and on the morning of the murder, which was as well remembered, very wet, he reached the house about 5 o'clock, and found the front door open, and a dinner laid on the table. He went to the next house, and folded his papers there. While he was occupied in this manner he saw a man, in a laboring dress, approaching with a dinner pail in his hand. This man passed him in front of Mr. Nathan's house, and then ascended the steps, to pick up a large piece of white paper, which was lying upon the top one. Having secured this he went to the next house, and through a search for the strange man was begun by the detectives. Hitherto they have not succeeded in finding him, and it is supposed that he has either obtained possession of some paper of value, which he is unwilling to part with, or has not yet associated the finding of it with the house in which the murder was committed, or that he has forgotten all about it.

If this story be true, and there is no reason to doubt that it is so, it is clear that the door of the house was open in spite of the evidence of a woman named Mangum to the contrary. Young R. Nathan, General Frank P. Blair, and the newsboy all concur in this important detail, and Superintendent Jordan himself did not at the time credit the testimony of the officer.

POLITICAL FESTIVITIES.

Shooting and Stabbing Affairs in Tennessee. A despatch giving the particulars of the fight between the Freemans at Brownsville, on Tuesday, was sent to the Avalanche as early as 4 o'clock in the afternoon per the Southern and Atlantic line, but for some reason was not transmitted. This morning we received a letter from Brownsville, which inquires, per the Western Union line, why this telegram did not appear in yesterday's Avalanche. The particulars of the affair, as gleaned from other sources, are as follows: A. Freeman is a candidate for Circuit Judge, Haywood county, and J. H. Freeman is a lawyer in Brownsville. The lawyer is opposed to the candidate, and published an article in the Brownsville paper reflecting upon him severely. A long correspondence took place between the parties upon the matter of the article, which the lawyer refused to withdraw on any way qualify. It was expected that a meeting would take place between them at it did on Tuesday evening. The candidates were sitting in the Court square at four o'clock on the evening in question, and the lawyer was waiting in front of Yancy Wilder's store, opposite the Court square. The lawyer, who was in the direction of the lawyer, who immediately stood to be ready for hostile demonstration. When the parties were about twenty yards apart, both having pistols drawn, the firing commenced. When several shots had been fired the lawyer said his iron was run dry. The candidate then threw aside his pistol, which contained one more shot. The lawyer at once drew a bowie, or that sort of long knife, and advanced upon the candidate, and in the middle of a street and made a pass at him, which did some effect in the hand. The fight being unequal at this time, parties friendly to both sides interceded and the combat ceased. The suits in the matter of the above shot in theft arm of the lawyer and the aforementioned in the hand of the candidate. Nothing fresh had been developed up to twelve last night.

The words "candidate" and "lawyer" in the above account are used to more clearly indicate the parties and to avoid the bewildering use of the name Freeman.—Memphis Avalanche, Aug. 4.

CASE OF MAYHEM.

Winfield Jerusalem Smith Cramped for the Coming Congressional Contest—Bully Boy With a Lie. A vivacious Memphis reporter gives the following account of the Mayhem in High Life reported by telegraph. He is also responsible for the above startling headline.

Winfield Jerusalem has made his debut as a pugilist in Memphis, after his return from a stormy time in Congress. It happened in a manner and form as follows:—Winfield Jerusalem was sauntering along Main on yesterday afternoon, observing how the suffragans were exercising the privilege of the franchise, when he unappreciably fell in with Blewitt and John W. Smith, formerly legislator from hereabouts to our State Legislature in close contact. Winfield Jerusalem joined in and after a bit he took occasion to remark to John W. Smith, "Is it not strange, Mr. Smith, that the Democratic papers will persevere in charging that I voted for the Loyal Indemnity bill?"

"Well," remarked John W., "I guess you voted for it. It is so."

"It is not so," said Winfield Jerusalem. "The papers lie, and whoever says that I did vote for it is a liar."

NAPOLEON IN EXILE.

A Scene in a London Theatre—Napoleon in Hebeke—An Empire at Stake. After the affair at Boulogne, with its supremely ridiculous termination, if not inception, Napoleon returned to London, and instead of hiding himself away until the storm of laughter had blown off at all his old haunts. Within a few days even he had the audacity to show himself in public at the theatre, and at the very theatre—the Princess—where some members of Louis Philippe's family were in attendance to witness Der Freischutz, in company with the Queen of England. Louis' appearance in the theatre, where he was well known, was the signal for a giggle which soon broke out into loud and uncontrollable laughter. Nothing daunted, he marched up the middle aisle with as much dignity and composure as if he were the admiral, and took a reserved seat directly opposite the box containing the royal party, French and English. Now, by a cool stroke of Louis' policy this seat had been taken in advance by a full knowledge of the probable events of the evening—his late fiasco getting him laughed at, and the Orleans at the theatre joining in it, if he should come there. Louis took his seat, the observed of all observers, if not the admirer of all admirers, and in such a place was his seat reserved as gave the audience from pit to gallery the best opportunities for observation. The laughter subsided, and the music went on. After a while the laughter was renewed, if not so loudly, at least as unmistakably as when our hero first put in an appearance. And this time the tables were turned, and the faces in the royal box were flushed with annoyance. There was direct, in front of them, as if by magic, as stone, and the "nephew of his uncle," his jaw at just such an angle as gave them and the audience every opportunity for noticing its solidity and the lurid moustache, finely waxed and stuck down from his lip. He and, in virtue of the place he had selected, it was impossible for any of the royal party to look from their box on to the stage without having their vision embrace the spectacle of the Napoleon in exile in all its massive, unmovable, and unchangeable grandeur. The entire performance of the opera that day never moved from its position of expression, and so odd did it look in its immovability that by degrees it began to excite more laughter than when the music was first heard, and the audience, glancing from the jaw to the royal party, made it so unpleasant that they left the theatre completely discomfited. The story spread through London, and almost made people forget the eagle of the Bonaparte expedition that failed to operate according to expectations, and the other ludicrous incidents of that most short and disastrous campaign.

When in New York one of his favorite resorts was a tavern well known to the pleasure-loving Hobokenese, called "Hotel Napoleon." It was kept at the time by a Frenchman, and was a favorite resort of the small French colony in the town.

AN EMPIRE AT STAKE. One evening they were all playing piquet, and drinking quite freely. At about the company among whom Bonaparte's opinions were well known, and by some not a little ridiculed, began discussing politics. The talk ran high. At last one more excited than the rest wagged heavily the waggon to be decided by a game of cards—"that a Bonaparte never would ascend the throne of France." "Qualify it by saying, Be at the head of the French nation, and I'll take you," said Louis. "I'll take the wager as you put it," said a friend of the Emperor. He won it, and to-day the winner occupies one of the most lucrative inferior positions in the Imperial gift in the Department of the Rhine. "And now I wager you will be the money I have," said Napoleon, when the bet was won, "that I will be, before I die, at the head of the French nation as the champion of democracy, and that I will give the right construction in the interest of humanity and civilization to my uncle's prophesy of 1821, at St. Helena." "In sixty years Europe will be republican or Cossack." "What do you mean by right construction?" asked one. "You mean to take my wager as I offered it," responded Louis.

Here there was some wrangling, and at length he explained that by "the right construction" he meant "republican." The wager was taken for a small amount, lost, won the second time, lost the third time, won, won, and won—four games of piquet out of six.
